Supporting patients with rare diseases and their families - a message from Rare Diseases Ireland: About 300,000 people in Ireland will contract a rare disease at some point in their lives, but within this a core group of thousands of families live in every community caring for patients with rare conditions. Most patients are children. Alone they are rare but together they are all too common. The one anxiety that they all share is a sense of isolation at being the only people with a certain condition and who live with a lack of support and available information. But there are organisations that support rare families, and communities of like-minded people with similar troubles, to learn from and lean on. For support for rare disease patients and their families please contact: Rare Disease Ireland (RDI) www.rdi.ie which provides information and support for rare disease patients and their families and The Rare Ireland parents support group on Facebook/rare Ireland is a closed group of supportive parents that is building a wider community to support its families.
